In a post announcing the release of Firefox 23, the nonprofit organization said that its browser will now support systems based on Windows 7 or Windows 8.1. This should be welcome news for consumers and business users alike who are looking for a web browser that integrates well with their Windows computers. However, it might be a little disappointing for Windows users who had expected that Mozilla would bring Firefox to Windows 10 in the near future. At the same time, many Windows users probably already have a web browser installed, and the addition of Firefox will be a welcome reminder of the many benefits of the open-source browser. Bringing Firefox to Windows 7 and 8.1 is "not necessarily a sign of Firefox moving away from the open Web," Mozillians write. Instead, the move is part of the broader Mozilla mission to "enable the best Web for everyone." Mozilla's Windows 7 and 8.1 support came just two days before Windows 10, which will ship on July 29th. However, it is also clear that Mozilla has not 82157476af
